Good Evening,

You have met all your H&S training requirements; however, before I can clear you, you must accomplish a prescreening exam from the 12th floor FOH clinic tomorrow. I've copied Nurse Niki on this email so she'll know to expect you. Please call her at x8598 to schedule an exam for tomorrow. If you have any questions or concerns, please let me know.

Kendra:

Lisa said I needed to reach out to you to see if I was cleared to travel for the hurricane response. Please let me know as soon as you can. I am supposed to depart on Sunday.

Thank you as always!!

Tonia,

As mentioned in your deployment email, you are not cleared to deploy until your health and safety has been cleared by Kendra.

Confidentiality Notice: Email disclaimers are assumed to be a wise precaution. But they are mostly, legally speaking, pointless. Lawyers and experts on internet policy say no court case has ever turned on the presence or absence of such an automatic email footer in America, the most litigious of rich countries. Many disclaimers, are, in effect, seeking to impose a contractual obligation unilaterally, and thus, are probably unenforceable. This is clear in Europe, where a directive from the European Commission tells the courts to strike out any unreasonable contractual obligation on a consumer if he has not freely negotiated it. And a footer stating that nothing in email should be used to break the law would be of no protection to a lawyer or financial advisor sending a message that did suggest something illegal.
